KISHORE SINHA • For a country like India, which has high population density and challenges in many fields, it will be a tragedy if we are not able to take initiatives now. Problems of climate change are going to affect human population and that means most of us as we are among the most populated countries of the world. If we take up the challenges, we set examples, and that is a good enough push for the developed countries. Take for example electric power production. Why should we not opt for more nuclear power plants and less thermal plants, or make best use of our thorium reserves rather than destroying our denuded forests for coal?
