

Astrid Schomaker

Astrid Schomaker is Director for Global Sustainable Development at the European Commission's Directorate General for the Environment. As such, she is in charge of international and interinstitutional relations as well as environment policy strategy, supervising the implementation of the EU's 7th Environment Action Programme.

She studied English, history and law in Hamburg and Norwich and has an LLM in international legal cooperation from Brussels' Free University. After a brief stint in academia, working at the law schools of the Universities of Hamburg and Ann Arbor (Michigan), she joined the European Commission in 1992, dealing with EU - US relations first at headquarters and then in the Commission's Washington Delegation. Returning to Brussels in 1999 she was in charge of regulatory cooperation with Japan, before, in 2001, becoming head of unit for Relations with the Andean Community in the Directorate General for External Relations.

Ms Schomaker moved to the Environment Department in 2004 and has lead work on a variety of issues ranging from bilateral and multilateral relations to chemicals, oceans and water industry as well as, more recently, overall coordination and communication, resource efficiency and economic analysis. She took up her present position in July 2016.
